- 30-day Average SOFR – The bank uses for pricing the USD loans the 30-day Average SOFR. Beginning on March 2020, the Federal Reserve Bank of New York (New York Fed), as administrator of the Secured Overnight Financing Rate \(SOFR\) and in cooperation with the Treasury Department's Office of Financial Research (OFR), publishes 30-, 90-, and 180-day SOFR Averages, in order to support a successful transition away from U.S. dollar (USD) LIBOR. The new SOFR Averages are referred to as “30-day Average SOFR”, “90-day Average SOFR” and “180-day Average SOFR.” Each business day, the New York Fed publishes the

SOFR Averages on the New York Fed's website, shortly after the SOFR is published at approximately 8:00 a.m. ET – (USA timezone). Further information on the “30-day Average SOFR” can be found here:

<https://www.newyorkfed.org/markets/reference-rates/sofr-averages-and-index>

The “30-day Average SOFR” is therefore an extension of the Secured Overnight Financing Rate (SOFR) and is the compounded average of the SOFR over rolling 30-calendar day periods. The Secured Overnight Financing Rate (SOFR) is a broad measure of the cost of borrowing cash overnight collateralized by Treasury securities. More information on this index can be found at:

- SONIA – The SONIA benchmark is a benchmark index administered by the Bank of England. The definition of SONIA has two elements: (i) Statement of underlying interest: SONIA is a measure of the rate at which interest is paid on sterling short-term wholesale funds in circumstances where credit, liquidity and other risks are minimal. (ii) Statement of methodology: On each London business day, SONIA is measured as the trimmed mean, rounded to four decimal places, of interest rates paid on eligible sterling denominated deposit transactions.

The trimmed mean is calculated as the volume-weighted mean rate, based on the central 50% of the volume-weighted distribution of rates. The SONIA rate for a given London business day is published at 9 am (London Time) on the following London business day. Further details at:
